☀️ The Light Your Body Is Missing

Most of us spend our days inside, where the light is quite ___1___. A room with every lamp switched on may only reach a few hundred lux, while even a ___2___ afternoon outside can be several times ___3___. Inside your brain, a master clock decides when you feel sleepy and when you feel alert. But it needs to be ___4___ every day, and morning light is its most important ___5___. In one famous study, eight adults went camping for a week with no electric lights. Their body clocks moved about two hours ___6___, and they started waking up more naturally. The problem with modern life is simple: we get too little light in the day and too much light from lamps and ___7___ at night. The good news? The answer is free. Try to go ___8___ for ten or twenty minutes soon after you wake up – even when the sky is grey.

5 Listen and complete the dialogue

listening · 6 points

Two friends on a grey autumn morning. Listen at ⏱️ 10:42 and write one word in each gap.

Lucy: Morning! Fancy a quick _____ (1) before work?

Jack: Have you seen it out there? It's so _____ (2). I'd rather stay in with a cup of tea.

Lucy: I know, but honestly, even a grey day is good for you. Come on, just fifteen minutes.

Jack: Fine. But only because the days are _____ (3) in and I'm starting to feel like a _____ (4).

Lucy: I know what you mean. It gets dark so early now.

Jack: By half past five, it's _____ (5) black.

Lucy: That's why I try to get some daylight while it _____ (6). Oh, look. The sun's coming out a bit.

Say it out loud! Read the dialogue with a friend – or play both parts yourself. Try to copy our rhythm and intonation. 🎭
